You've Been Denied Workers' Compensation. Now What?

Has your workers' compensation case been denied? We know this can be frustrating for anyone who is suffering from a legitimate on-the-job injury. Here are a few of the most common reasons why your claim may have been denied.

Common Reasons for Denial:

- You didn't report the claim immediately.
- Your employer disputed the claim.
- Your insurance company denied the claim.
- There was insufficient evidence.

If you received a letter stating your workers' compensation has been denied -- don't panic. You may still be able to contest the denial of your claim and receive the compensation that you are entitled to under the law by following these steps:

Steps to Follow After a Workers' Compensation Claim Denial:

- 1. Contact Your Employer - If the denial of your workers' compensation claim was due to mistaken paperwork, this might be a problem you can work out with your employer or its insurance company.

2. Talk to An Attorney - An attorney who is experienced in workers' compensation cases will be able to help you determine whether or not an appeal of your claim denial is the best course of action for you. Since the workers' compensation process can be complicated, it is important that you have an experienced attorney at your side to help you prepare a strong case.

If you have had a workers' compensation claim denied, we encourage you to contact our experienced attorneys. We are here to help you every step of the way. Call 718-626-7730 for legal assistance or visit our website to learn more.
